Try It at Home.

The Virginia newspapers are noting a reflux of the tide of emigration from that State which set in after Appomattox and ever since has rolled on in varying volume. It seemed the darkest of a succession of dark days for Virginia when Lee surrendered. A vast battle field for four years, stripped of nearly everything in the nature of moveable property, he untold sacrifices were unavailing, and now she was broken and disheartened. It was natural that her young men, and some of her middle aged men, should be eager for a fresh start anywhere out of Virginia.

The West and the Southwest, pointing to their cheap and fertile lands, made seduc tive bids. Here were fortune and adventure on the same road, and the tide flowed that way. Hardships was to be a romance a mere variation of the mono tony of financial success. These emigrants were willing to do anything, dare anything, that would bring the reward. Many o them have done well. It is doubtful whether there is one of them who could not not have done equally as well in his own State. Some of them have not done so well as as the industrious pushing ones who remained behind, and these are turning their steps homeward. This is the phenomenon to which the Virginia newspapers are calling attention, and on this r ady text they are preaching sermons of good advise to the young men of their State. The Lynchburg Advance, taking a sensible view of the situation, describes the hardships, privations and countless sacrifices of pioneer life, and very pertinently adds: "Any young man in Virginia, who will go to the rich, cheap mountain labds of Virginia, work and live the same way, will saue more money, and can each year buy Virginia land, and live better, bave better health, and when he gets a little ahead, have better society, and a better chance to invest his money. We know of thousands of acres in Virginia nearer to market, nearer to churches and school, rich, productive in fruit, in tobacco, wheat, rye, oats or potatoes, adjoining larg mo intain ranges for hogs and cattle, but the difficulty is our people will not go to these places and live and work as they do on the frontiers of Texas, Kansas and other What our cotemporary so well says of Virginia, its rich resources and golden opportunities, applies with even greater force to the more virgin State of West Virginia. In the natural features of this State there is everything to attract the settler. The farmer, the stockman, the miner, the lumberman and the manufacturer find here all the materials and conditions for the successful conduct of their several industries. Lands are cheap, markets near at No West Virginian need go away from his own State to find profitable employment for his capital and his labor. And both of the Virginias possess advantages for which new communities in the far West and the Southwest must wait and toil for many years. Let our young men who are looking abroad for openings cast their eyes around on this home land of plenty and try first its promise and its yield. Let them go to work here as they would in some remote spot, and with far less sacrifice the ontcome will be at least as great

The Mormon missionaries have their headquarters in the South at Chattanoogr. They have presiding elders for the various districts, and eighty-five preachers of the rank and file. degraded people.

Some of the best English jockeys are women; daughters of farmers, or of country squires, who have lost their fortunes. They have been accustomed to ride to hounds from their childhood, are perfectly fearless and their light weight in the saddle makes them desirable as jockeys. Charles Kingsley's poem of "Loraine Loree" has one of these women jockeys for its heroine. IN SPRINGTIME.

The brown old trees are whispering together;
What secrets do they know?
In vain we watch and wait and look and listen;
They will not tell usso.
But soon some morning, when we are not thinking
of anything they say.
We stand astonished at the transformation
Wrought in a single cay.

They are no longer brown and bare and barren,
And our delighted eyes
See why they kept the secret—just to give us
The robins sing helr hearts out in the branches which dance in overy brown.
What would the world be in its longed for springtime
